Karley Sullivan

Split Image #33

2013

karleysullivan.com/

Like so many openings, this series began with a mistake. I didn't know the mechanism, I wasn't familiar with how things worked, and there was some weird stripe of black on every image.
I was able to fix it, imagining time and light looping, lemniscate-like - but by that time, I didn't want to.

The darkness had become extroverted, exhibitionist even, dancing and cajoling at me. It was a thing of its own, dark and centered, a potential void in the fabric of seeing. It was everything pitched into a velvet negativity; that great stuff of vision but not sight. It was in the middle, and giggling with joy and excitement I had found it - some sense in the obscure, some luscious strange way of poking a hole in what we think we know.

"ABLUTIO texture"

by
Via Aerea

Photo
by Valeria Crociata

The concept ABLUTIO is based on the idea of washing away of impurities and regeneration. Water works randomly on colors melting away and renovating their settings: the T shirt renews every wash, taking away washing machine from daily use to turn it into 'deus ex machina', pureness discloser.
